Death to the Baby Bells! The Future of Telecom…

For nearly 3 months now I’ve been running a system called Vonage in my home. Vonage works just like your regular home telephone, only without your local phone company needing to be involved. Oh yeah, and you get 100% FREE long distance with it. That’s right, flat rate long distance for the low low price of $40 per month.

Instead of using phone lines, Vonage uses your high-speed internet connection to complete your calls. We all know that attempts at making phone calls over the net in the past have failed. The one thing that sticks out in my mind about making phone calls on the internet is the sound quality sucked. The only thing they were ever good for was making prank calls to people because there was no way to hold a decent conversation with all the echoing and static. But Vonage has managed to change all that.

Not only is the sound quality just as good as my old SBC Ameritech service, it’s actually better. When I pick up any phone in the house, I instantly get a dial tone. None of my computers need to even be running, all the calls are handled by a Cisco box that plugs directly into my existing router and cable modem. Making a call is just as fast as making a call on a regular phone line. The thing rules.

Not only do I get better quality service than Ameritech could offer, but it’s also much cheaper. Ameritech likes to charge you for things like 3-way calling, call waiting, caller ID, call forwarding, voicemail, etc. Vonage gives you all of that for free. Remember that pesky $5.00 monthly charge your local phone company makes you pay just to have a long distance carrier? Not with Vonage, because there is no long distance. Doesn’t it suck when your local phone company charges you for 911 emergency service? Don’t worry, Vonage throws that in there for free too. All for around $40 per month. (continued on page 5…)

The regular phone companies are really screwed this time. As if they don't have enough problems with everyone ditching their home phone lines for cheaper wireless phones, now they have to deal with the internet stealing the rest of their customers. They've raised rates and screwed their customers over for decades. $7.00 for caller ID? $1.00 for an unlisted number? Remember when they used to charge customers for touch tone service, as if that cost them more? It's payback time. Ameritech was getting $70 a month from me, but not anymore. My long distance provider was getting over $100 a month with me paying 4.5 cents for long distance calls. No more, it's all flat rate now.

They even have a smaller package for people who don't use the phone as much which is $26.00 for 500 minutes per month and unlimited local calls. The problem with local calls is that they probably don't have an area code where you live yet so your free "local" calls would only be good in an area that you probably don't live in. Go with the $40 plan, it's probably cheaper than what you pay now.

The downside of this service? I didn't get a local phone number. The closest area code to me was in Chicago which is 6 hours away. This doesn't bother me though, nobody calls me at home anyway since I have a cell phone. I settled on a random area code in California. And if you want a 2nd phone number or a 2nd line, you have to buy another $40/month box. Still not a bad deal though, less than $100 for 2 phone lines and unlimited long distance calling. I'd say that beats the hell out of anything Ameritech could offer me.

This product officially renders stealing phone calls utterly useless. As if stealing phone calls wasn't pointless enough with cell phones being so cheap and offering free long distance on nights and weekends. Now we get free legal quality long distance with Vonage. This will hopefully be followed by the collapse of a bunch of long distance companies. And if local phone companies don't start competing by offering the same cheap services, they'll end up being next. The phone companies all needed a good shakeup like this, we can only hope it'll result in better service and cheaper products. Do your part by purchasing a Vonage system immediately!
